Course Introduction

Adolescent Health Promotion is a strategic and evidence-based approach designed to improve the physical health, mental wellbeing, emotional resilience, social development, and life skills of young people aged 10–19 years. In today's rapidly changing digital and social environment, adolescents face increasing challenges related to mental health disorders, cyberbullying, substance abuse, nutritional deficiencies, reproductive health risks, social anxiety, screen addiction, and lifestyle diseases. This training course equips educators, healthcare professionals, youth workers, NGOs, counselors, and community leaders with innovative tools, preventive healthcare strategies, youth engagement techniques, and digital health promotion practices to empower adolescents toward healthier and more productive lives.

Adolescent Health Promotion Training Course integrates modern public health frameworks, psychosocial support systems, adolescent-friendly communication, leadership development, gender-sensitive approaches, emotional intelligence, and community-based interventions. Through interactive learning, real-world case studies, role plays, group discussions, and behavior change communication models, participants gain practical competencies in adolescent wellness, mental health advocacy, reproductive health education, peer counseling, nutrition awareness, and life skills education. The program aligns with global Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), youth empowerment initiatives, school health promotion strategies, and preventive healthcare systems for long-term social impact.
