Course Introduction

In an era marked by growing social awareness, inclusivity, and evidence-based policy-making, researching sensitive topics—such as gender identity, trauma, mental health, human rights, and social inequality—demands rigorous methodology, ethical responsibility, and clear, compassionate communication. Communicating such findings effectively to non-expert audiences—including policymakers, media, communities, and the general public—is crucial for impact, action, and empathy. Communication of Research Findings to Non-Experts Training Course equips researchers, journalists, NGOs, and communicators with the tools to handle sensitive data ethically, and translate findings into accessible, culturally appropriate, and emotionally intelligent narratives.

By combining communication strategy, data interpretation, ethical research, and storytelling, participants will learn to bridge the gap between academia and the public. The course emphasizes practical communication frameworks, stakeholder engagement, and real-world applications through case studies, simulations, and guided feedback. This training prepares participants to build trust, counter misinformation, and drive positive social change through transparent, trauma-informed, and inclusive communication.
